server, which then registers the thumbnail images to a thumbnail database in a CMM database server, as well as content information, including the file name and location, to a content database in the same server.

Second, the distributed streaming processing workflow with a streaming job distribution scheme is the most important part of the overall processing flow. Figure 7 illustrates the distributed processing workflow. Thumbnail images are updated periodically in a Web interface and the metadata of the thumbnail images are registered each time a transcoding task is completed. When users select and request media content by clicking a thumbnail image, CMM obtains the location and file name of the selected media via a content database. CMM then requests the status of streaming servers via a system status collector and selects the optimal streaming server from those in HadoopDMT based on the SRC algorithm, as described in section 3.2.3. The content streaming service begins after the optimal streaming server is selected.

CONCLUSIONS AND FUTURE STUDY

In this paper, we proposed the CloudMSS system, a cloud-based distributed multimedia streaming system, for providing a stable social media-based streaming service. The proposed system includes a high-speed distributed transcoding function, which is a core cloud computing technique using the MapReduce framework, and includes a distributed streaming function based on the SRC algorithm in consideration of the use rate of a streaming resource. The biggest benefit of this system is that the system stability and expandability can be secured by introducing the Hadoop-based distributed management and file management system policies across the system. In the future, for a stable operation and expansion of the proposed system, we will confirm its performance by reviewing the enhancement techniques, verifying the transcoding performance, and including a performance test in which the system is set up in a commercial cloud.
